

SOVEREIGNTY AND SOCIAL CHANGE IN THE WAKE OF INDIA'S RECENT SODOMY CASES

DEEPA DAS ACEVEDO*

Abstract: American constitutional law scholars have long questioned whether courts can truly drive social reform, and this uncertainty remains even in the wake of recent landmark decisions affecting the LGBT community. In contrast, court watchers in India—spurred by developments in a special type of legal action developed in the late 1970s known as public interest litigation (PIL)—have only recently begun to question the judiciary’s ability to promote progressive social change. Indian scholarship on this point has veered between despair that PIL cases no longer reliably produce good outcomes for India’s most disadvantaged and optimism that public interest litigation can be returned to its glory days of heroic judicial intervention. Perhaps no pair of cases so nicely captures this dichotomy as the 2009 decision in Naz Foundation v. Government of NCT of Delhi, which decriminalized sodomy, and the 2012 decision in Koushal v. Naz Foundation, which overruled Naz. This paper uses public interest litigation and India’s recent sodomy cases to demonstrate that the relationship between state actors and citizens is often far less stable than the democratic ideal of “citizen sovereignty” would suggest. I argue, first, that supporters of public interest litigation should neither give up on PIL suits as a means of effecting social reform nor imagine that PIL suits can ever reliably produce desirable outcomes. As a type of legal action, public interest litigation simply cannot be reverse engineered in this way. But second, I show why this unreliability is not as worrisome as it might first appear to be, by analyzing the well-documented and widely critiqued shift in PIL cases at the end of the twentieth century. While earlier PIL cases reflect the Indian Constitution’s commitment to government-led social reform and the sharing of sovereignty between citizens and the state, contemporary PIL cases reflect the Constitution’s commitment to an agency theory of sovereignty whereby government merely acts on behalf of citizens. Neither vision of sovereignty is paramount over the long run, and shifts in public interest litigation reflect the productive and dynamic equilibrium between the two.

INTRODUCTION

The idea of legal liberalism—that courts can be the means of progressive social change—has been on something of a roller-coaster ride in the United States.¹ Scholars documenting the ups and downs of this journey usually begin with the rise of legal realism toward the end of the nineteenth century and the subsequent development of legal process theory.² They then usually focus on the Warren Court, followed by the Supreme Court’s conservative turn in the 1970s and 1980s, before tapering off around the rise of neo-republican theory in the 1980s and 90s.³ More recently, *Obergefell v. Hodges*⁴ and its precursors have prompted some commentators—usually critics⁵—to argue that the Court is once again acting as an agent of social change, although many others from across the ideological spectrum have rejected this view.⁶ For the most part, American legal liberalism has been having a rough time of it for around three decades.⁷

¹ See LAURA KALMAN, THE STRANGE CAREER OF LEGAL LIBERALISM 2 (1996) (calling legal liberalism “trust in the potential of courts, particularly the Supreme Court, to bring about ‘those specific social reforms that affect large groups of people such as blacks, or workers, or women, or partisans of a particular persuasion; in other words, policy chance with nationwide impact’”).

Like the United States, India is experiencing something of a downward adjustment in the way scholars, lawyers, and judges think of court-driven progressive change, but the context and implications of this shift are hugely and necessarily distinct. Let's begin with some constitutional prose. The Indian Constitution prohibits the practice of untouchability, opens Hindu temples to government oversight, grants an affirmative right to primary education, and has sixteen non-justiceable (but frequently discussed and interpreted) articles that commit the state to trying its hand at everything from minimizing economic inequality to constructing a uniform civil code that can replace religious personal laws.⁸ Unsurprisingly, comparative analyses of the Indian and American constitutions have usually characterized the former as "militant" and the latter as "acquiescent" in terms of the relationship they envision between the state and society.⁹ In this narrative, India's founding document sets up a state that seeks to reform society by challenging old practices and affirming new rights. Conversely, the American Constitution seeks merely to preserve the status quo.¹⁰ For anyone subscribing to this vision of Indian constitutionalism, signs that legal liberalism may be on the wane carry a different and arguably a more dispiriting significance in India than they would in the United States.

scholars on either side of the court-party thesis. On values-based judging, compare MENACHEM MAUTNER, LAW AND THE CULTURE OF ISRAEL 38 (2011) (critically describing the "courts as agents of liberal values"), with Aharon Barak, The Role of the Supreme Court in a Democracy, 33 ISR. L. REV. 1, 3–4 (1999) (arguing that "[t]he democratic character of our regime, and the social values derived from it . . . constitute a system of principles and values according to which the judge creates law. . . . The judge gives expression to all these"). On the role of courts in effecting social change in Israel, compare Aharon Barak, Foreword: A Judge on Judging: The Role of a Supreme Court in a Democracy, 116 HARV. L. REV. 19, 46–47 (2002) (stating that while a supreme court cannot "cure every ill of society" or "be the primary agent for social change" it "has an important role in bridging the gap between law and society and in protecting the fundamental values of democracy with human rights at the center"), with Ruth Gavison, The Role of Courts in Rifted Democracies, 33 ISR. L. REV. 216, 218 (1999) ("[I]n rifted democracies [like Israel], courts should be reluctant to determine specific arrangements and priorities, especially in areas of social controversy, where the grounds of judicial action are not clear."). The court-party thesis is the idea that citizen interest groups drive judicial interpretation of the Charter and that "judges drive the Charter, not vice versa." F.L. Morton, The Charter Revolution and the Court Party, 30 OSGOODE HALL L.J. 627, 630 (1992); see also Lise Gotell, Book Review, 30 QUEEN'S L.J. 883, 896 (2005) (reviewing CHRISTOPHER P. There are great problems with relying on this kind of constitutional shorthand in general and with subscribing to this characterization of the Indian Constitution in particular. An important goal of this paper is to argue that Indian constitutional jurisprudence actually and appropriately reflects a dynamic equilibrium between two very different visions of state-society relations, rather than being straightforwardly committed to state-led reform.¹¹ Each of these visions of state-society relations corresponds to an understanding of how sovereignty works in a democracy. Some elements of the Indian Constitution reflect a fairly conventional agency view of governmental authority,¹² while others envision such an active or militant role for government that it is difficult to characterize the state as merely the agent of the sovereign people.¹³ Since neither of these visions of sovereignty is—or is meant to be—paramount over the long run, they exist in a perpetual yet dynamic equilibrium with one another. Part III will briefly describe these two visions and explain how they are borne up by the specific aspect of Indian law, public interest litigation, that’s at issue here.

A second reason why a decline in legal liberalism has different implications for India is that the history of court-driven change (as opposed to broadly state-driven change) as well as the public reception of such change have been markedly different there.¹⁴ While Indian courts have always had an important role in advancing and upholding progressive policies,¹⁵ they

¹⁴ See, e.g., K.G. Balakrishnan, Chief Justice of India, Fifteenth Annual Lecture at the Singapore Academy of Law: Growth of Public Interest Litigation in India (Oct. 8, 2008). The Chief Justice—speaking on legal liberalism in India—remarked:

The main rationale for “judicial activism” in India lies in the highly unequal social profile of our population, where judges must take proactive steps to protect the interests of those who do not have a voice in the political system and do not have the means or information to move the Courts. This places the Indian Courts in a very different social role as compared to several developed nations where directions given by ‘unelected judges’ are often viewed as unjustified restraints on the will of the majority.

have been especially prominent since the rise of public interest litigation in the 1970s.¹⁶

Unlike in the United States, where “public interest law” refers to legal work and advocacy done for the greater good or for those who cannot afford representation,¹⁷ Indian “public interest litigation” (PIL) is a distinct way of articulating a legal complaint, much like filing an individual civil suit is different from filing a class action or an administrative grievance.¹⁸ Framing a complaint as a PIL suit allows petitioners to avoid traditional standing requirements (like personal harm)¹⁹ and briefing requirements (like the submission of formal writ petitions) in the interest of removing barriers to justice for the most disadvantaged.²⁰ Additionally, courts hearing PIL suits often act as quasi-arbitrators, conduct independent fact-finding, and require periodic progress reports from the parties.²¹ And not infrequently, courts

For too long, the apex constitutional court had become “an arena of legal quibbling for men with long purses.” Now, increasingly, the Court is being identified by justices as well as people as the “last resort for the oppressed and the bewildered.” . . . The medium through which all this has happened, and is happening, is social action litigation, a distinctive by-product of the catharsis of the 1975–1976 Emergency.

Given these striking features and the stack of extremely progressive PIL cases that were decided early on—not to mention a sense that India’s executive and legislative branches are incapable of governing—it’s no wonder that public interest litigation is viewed as a crucial tool for a court focused on “good governance.”²³ Simultaneously, however, PIL cases have become a popular tool for petitioners pursuing urban, middle-class, or socially conservative ends—so much so, in fact, that contemporary scholarship on public interest litigation is overwhelmingly preoccupied with asking if this much-beloved hallmark of Indian jurisprudence can be saved or even defended.²⁴

Few cases better reflect the shifting tone of public interest litigation and legal liberalism in India than the 2009 opinion in *Naz Foundation v. Government of NCT of Delhi*²⁵ that decriminalized sodomy and the 2013 *Koushal v. Naz Foundation*²⁶ decision that reversed Naz. Naz was filed in the Delhi High Court by an NGO focusing on HIV/AIDS and sexual-health issues, while Koushal was filed in the Supreme Court by lead petitioners described as “citizens of India who believe they have the moral responsibility and duty in protecting [the] cultural values of Indian society.”²⁷ Read together, Naz and Koushal express the primary argument of this paper—at once narrow and extremely contentious (at least among scholars of Indian law)—that public interest litigation can never reliably advance certain kinds of progressive outcomes.

To be perfectly clear, I am not just arguing that PIL cases have increasingly produced outcomes favoring advantaged litigants. This descriptive argument has already been made, with excellent empirical support and in many different areas of the law, by several lawyers and legal academics.²⁸ Nor am I advocating any particular way of “fixing” public interest litigation so that it returns to its early focus on removing barriers to justice, expanding or enforcing constitutional rights, and resolving group-based disadvantages. Packing the Indian Supreme Court with 1980s-style activist justices is unrealistic, while urging sitting justices to abandon their command-and-control model of case management for a more facilitative one may offer procedural improvements but is unlikely to restore public interest litigation’s focus on the country’s most marginalized citizens.²⁹ Indeed, if the only thing that will resuscitate the worth of public interest litigation is the kind of rights-enforcing opinions common during the first ten to fifteen years of PIL history, I am quite doubtful that there is anything we can concertedly do.

But this—despite the heartbreaking outcome in Koushal—may not be as bad as it sounds. For one thing, a few recent examples suggest that public Thiruvengadam also observes that “[s]ome [unnamed] progressives have implicitly suggested that what is required is . . . a new generation of judges in the mould of [early PIL-friendly justices] be appointed,” a suggestion he rightfully responds to by saying that “such a view is both unrealistic and problematic.” Id. at 357–58. interest litigation isn't, in a consequentialist sense, already a lost cause.³⁰ More importantly, the kind of court-driven progressive social reform captured in the early PIL cases, vital and thrilling as it is, is only half the story of democratic governance in India. State-driven reform, however rights-enhancing it may be, does not so define Indian democracy that the periodic (or even somewhat frequent) failure of PIL cases to achieve progressive outcomes spells decay and doom. Rather, the dynamic interplay between a fairly conventional, citizen-sovereignty vision of democratic government and a more unusual support for state- and court-led reform gives Indian democracy the flexibility it needs to survive over the long run.

Because public interest litigation is this paper's window into the relationship between courts, social change, and sovereignty, Part I overviews the belief in the ameliorative potential of PIL suits as well as recent disillusionment on that front. Part II zeroes in on Naz and Koushal, outlining the reasoning and the vision of state-society relations envisioned in each decision. Part III briefly summarizes the idea of dynamic equilibrium as a theory of constitutional identity and design before exploring how the overall changes in PIL outcomes (discussed in Part I) and the specific outcomes in Naz and Koushal (discussed in Part II) exemplify that structure. For the legal liberals among us, describing Indian constitutional jurisprudence and public interest litigation this way should be both reassuring and worrisome: PIL cases may not be failing progressives as much as is commonly feared, but they were never meant to be sure-fire tools of reform, either.

I. PUBLIC CONFUSION OVER PUBLIC INTEREST LITIGATION

Indian lawyers and law scholars generally describe the initial period of Supreme Court PIL suits—roughly, the late 1970s through early 1990s—in the language of heroic judicial intervention.³¹ A former Chief Justice of the Union of India*, WP(C) No. 196/2001 (Nov. 28, 2001 interim order), <http://www.righttofoodindia.org/orders/nov28.html> [<https://perma.cc/L9VM-JY82>] (requiring state governments to provide every child attending a government or government-aided primary school with a free, cooked midday meal).

Supreme Court called public interest litigation “a potent weapon” and an example of how “[j]udicial creativity . . . has enabled realisation of the promise of socio-economic justice made in the Preamble to the Constitution of India.”³² One of India’s most prominent legal scholars declared, during the early days of public interest litigation, that “[t]he Supreme Court of India is at long last becoming, after thirty two years of the Republic, the Supreme Court for Indians.”³³ And this sentiment is not unwarranted: early PIL cases forced negligent town councils to provide slum dwellers with basic sanitation facilities,³⁴ released individuals whose pre-trial detentions exceeded the maximum penalty for their alleged crimes,³⁵ and compensated women raped by on-duty Indian soldiers.³⁶ In other words, public interest litigation has unarguably been thought of as a vehicle for advancing equality and affirmative rights, and in many instances it has—also unarguably—been successful in this mission.

Besides raw outcomes, the good vibes surrounding public interest litigation emanate from a sense that the Supreme Court devised the approach and PIL petitioners continue to use it only out of sheer necessity. Governmental malfunction is a longstanding theme in Indian politics, especially at the federal level. Indeed, “malfunction” is a kind of extreme euphemism for much of what happens in New Delhi: in 2014, thirty-four percent of sitting Lok Sabha members faced criminal charges,³⁷ the last ten years alone have seen a number of scandals with price tags between USD $30–40 billion a piece,³⁸ and the current Prime Minister was under criminal investigation as late as 2012 in connection with the mass killing of Muslims in his state during his chief min-istership.³⁹ In 2015, India ranked seventy-sixth on Transparency International's Corruption Perception Index, which is actually an improvement over its 2013 performance (ninety-fourth).⁴⁰ Matters had reached such a pitch by 2011 that an activist named Anna Hazare gained significant political traction for the idea of a people's ombudsman with independent prosecutorial authority and police powers over virtually the entire federal government.⁴¹ There is even a small but identifiable genre of anti-corruption cinema that is equal parts fantasy and self-flagellation.⁴²

All of this has rather understandably fed into strong support for public interest litigation. While the federal judiciary's halo has lately become a bit tarnished, it still enjoys a reputation for good intentions and efficacy that vastly outstrips anything the executive or legislative branches could hope for.⁴³ This reputational advantage, combined with the very real failures of the other branches and the very real success of early PIL cases, has led supporters of public interest litigation to argue that the courts merely step in to right the wrongs committed by other branches.⁴⁴ Some commentators maintain that given certain procedural aspects of public interest litigation—non-adversarial engagement, ongoing investigation, periodic reporting—courts are in fact compensating for the lack of a “genuine deliberative forum” in the legislature.⁴⁵ At the very least, many supporters of public interest litigation suggest that the other branches’ failure to realize the substantive ends of democracy makes them no more representative as institutions than the unelected but populist judiciary.⁴⁶ That is to say, the classic and still dominant view is that public interest litigation is good on both principled and consequentialist grounds.

Recently, however, the veneer has started to peel. Several commentators argue that public interest litigation simply doesn’t protect disadvantaged citizens the way it used to.⁴⁷ For one thing, there has been a series of landmark cases whose outcomes favored corporate or urban middle-class interests over those of more vulnerable populations: the “dam” cases, in which thousands of

See also Shukla, supra note 28, at 3758 (stating that “[t]he portends for the future are ominous” because of “[d]eclining authority and erosion of the legislature and executive along with an increasingly activist judiciary favouring the haves rather than the have-nots”). tribal and poor rural communities were displaced to further development projects;⁴⁸ the “relocation” cases, in which polluting industries (and the migrant workers who depended on them) were moved outside city limits;⁴⁹ and the “gentrification” cases, in which thousands (sometimes hundreds of thousands) of low-income residents and slum dwellers were evicted from their homes pursuant to urban beautification projects.⁵⁰ The language of these newer decisions has been harsher, too. In the gentrification cases, for instance, individuals who used to be “pavement dwellers” became “encroacher[s],” and their presence on public lands went from symbolizing their necessity and the state’s failure to symbolizing their thievery and opportunism relative to upstanding, pay-your-own-way homeowners.⁵¹

Lest they be accused of cherry-picking, critics of current PIL jurisprudence can also point to preliminary quantitative studies that suggest these landmark disappointments are representative rather than anomalous outcomes.⁵² When it comes to modern PIL cases dealing with fundamental rights claims, “it seems that claimants from advantaged classes have higher win rates than claimants not from advantaged classes”—and, moreover, that the disparity between win rates has been increasing over time.⁵³ To be sure, there are problems with relying on quantitative studies to show change over time in PIL jurisprudence because early PIL cases are harder to access and classify and also because experienced PIL plaintiffs may be self-selecting

⁵³ Gauri, supra note 28, at 13. Gauri observes that:

[A]dvantaged class claimants had a 73% probability of winning a Fundamental Rights claim for cases in which an order or decision was rendered from years 2000–2008, whereas the win rate for claimants not from advantaged classes for the same years was 47%. For the 1990s, rates were 68% and 47%, respectively. But in the years prior to 1990, claimants not from advantaged classes enjoyed higher success rates than those from advantaged classes. The differences for the 1990s and 2000s are significantly different from each other, based on a simple chi-square test and a simple probit estimation out of the court system⁵⁴—in other words, decreasing win rates may reflect declining merit rather than changing judicial sympathies.⁵⁵ But the quantitative analyses of public interest litigation are rapidly closing in on these issues and the prognosis still does not look good.⁵⁶

All of this is to say that whether they draw on specific case studies or sky-view analyses, even supporters of public interest litigation tend to feel that “the Supreme Court in the 1990s and in the current decade[s] is refusing to enforce rights which the Court of the 1980s would have.”⁵⁷ The successful PIL petitioner today is increasingly likely to be a middle-class individual speaking up on her own behalf about the state’s failures in areas like corruption, pollution, and gender equality.⁵⁸ These are all worthwhile issues and they are in keeping with the court’s broader shift towards a “good governance” role.⁵⁹ Still, they are a far cry from the concerns of migrant and bonded laborers, child workers, incarcerated under-trials, slum dwellers, and wards of state who were the focal points of early PIL cases, and whose problems by and large may still need addressing.⁶⁰ It is increasingly not the ⁵⁵ See Gauri & Chitalkar, supra note 28, at 5, 8 (stating that “there appears to have been a change in the nature of issues being brought to the Court through PILs” and that the “apparent increase in the share of advantaged litigants” may be “an artifact of a change in reporting practices on the part of the Court”).

⁵⁶ Varun Gauri’s efforts to systematically examine the perceived shift in public interest litigation have been especially productive. Over a series of papers from 2009 to 2015, Gauri (in some cases working with co-authors) has used slightly different data sets and criteria yet found, fairly consistently, that public interest litigation largely merits the criticisms levied against it. See Gauri, supra note 28; Varun Gauri, Fundamental Rights and Public Interest Litigation in India: Overachieving or Underachieving?, 1 INDIAN J.L. & ECON. 71 (2010) (largely building on the 2009 paper); Gauri & Chitalkar, supra note 28.

case that public interest litigation is a “last recourse for the oppressed and the bewildered.”⁶¹

As a result of this shift, current conversations about public interest litigation are preoccupied with how to regroup and reverse course. One suggestion has been that judges should step back from the command and control model of judicial proceedings that has come to characterize PIL cases over the last two decades and adopt a more facilitative role—or, in American legal language, that judges should function as mediators when hearing PIL suits.⁶² Another idea is that the Supreme Court should “evolve a set of guidelines for restrained and responsible PIL” so that the process regains legitimacy and the outcomes reflect greater sensitivity to potential third-party effects on marginalized communities.⁶³

The very idea of fixing public interest litigation suggests that it can be refashioned to once more reliably produce the kind of progressive results achieved during its introductory phase. Of course, few if any current commentators would argue that public interest litigation, even if properly reformed, can inevitably produce progressive results.⁶⁴ But even trying to fix public interest litigation to produce mostly progressive reforms is like trying to read only half the Indian Constitution, and it deserves a similar response: that’s just not how it works.⁶⁵

This is not to say that I’m advocating the other extreme—abandoning public interest litigation as a hopelessly lost cause—which particularly upsetting outcomes like the one in Koushal might tempt us to do.⁶⁶ That’s as dispiriting and unnecessary as some of the proposals to fix public interest litigation are logistically and politically unrealistic. But before we get to what the shift in PIL jurisprudence means for social justice efforts going forward, it’s worth considering the stakes a little more deeply. What do the arguments for or against public interest litigation tell us about law and democracy in India? How can such a miniscule body of case law (PIL suits account for less than 0.5% of the Supreme Court's docket)⁶⁷ not only speak to profoundly important aspects of social life but to the very foundation of democratic governance? For these questions and more, we need to take a brief detour into the recent Delhi High Court and Supreme Court decisions on sodomy.

II. NAZ AND KOUSHAL

*Naz*⁶⁸ and *Koushal*⁶⁹ are big cases, widely discussed. Commentary and scholarship on the two decisions is understandably vast in India, but the cases' influence has by no means been geographically limited. In the United States, for instance, the New York Times greeted Naz with an op-ed triumphantly announcing "Indian Court Overturns Gay Sex Ban."⁷⁰ Similarly, in the approximately three years since Koushal was handed down, more than a dozen articles and notes discussing it have been published in American law journals (to say nothing of Indian or international law journals).⁷¹ Across continents and publication venues, the reviews overwhelmingly celebrate Naz and excoriate Koushal.⁷² This section does not challenge that assessment: if there is nothing to like in Koushal's substantive outcome, there is considerably less to applaud in what passes for judicial reasoning in the opinion. Moreover, the validity of the reasoning in either Naz or Koushal is not especially relevant to the larger arguments of this paper concerning shifts in public interest litigation and dynamic equilibrium in the Indian Constitution. But because it is impossible to discuss a case without actually discussing the case, this section will first briefly overview the facts and arguments in Naz and Koushal before placing the decisions in the broader context of PIL jurisprudence.

A. Public Morality, Constitutional Morality, and Feigned Deference

The named petitioner in Naz was an NGO that concentrates on HIV/AIDS awareness and support in India.⁷³ The Foundation filed a PIL petition to have section 377 of the Indian Penal Code read down on the grounds that the criminalization of sodomy made men who have sex with men reluctant to seek HIV/AIDS support.⁷⁴ Others joined the effort, including the national Ministry of Health and Welfare and an umbrella group called "Voices Against § 377 IPC."⁷⁵ The respondents included the Ministry of Home Affairs as well as an activist organization called the Joint Action Council Kannur (JACK) and a private individual named B.P. Singhal.⁷⁶

The Naz petitioners challenged the constitutionality of section 377 under Article 14 (equal protection), Article 15 (prohibition of, among other things, sex discrimination), Article 19 (free speech and expression), and Article 21 (protection of life and personal liberty).⁷⁷ They also argued that the ⁷⁷ Writ Petition, supra note 75, at 8–11.

Indian Penal Code's condemnation of homosexuality was outdated and not in keeping with Indian culture.⁷⁸ But rather than ask for the provision to be struck down entirely, the petitioners asked that section 377 be read down to criminalize penile-non-vaginal sex only when it is non-consensual or involves a minor.⁷⁹

In granting their petition, the Delhi High Court made several constitutional arguments. First, the court held that the Indian Constitution indirectly supports a fundamental right to privacy as well as a right to a dignified life, and that both rights require protection for private consensual sex acts between adults (the Article 21 argument).⁸⁰ Second, and related to this first argument, the court held that even if section 377 reflects public morality concerning sodomy, public morality alone does not constitute the kind of compelling state interest that's required to restrict a fundamental right.⁸¹ Third, it held that section 377 unfairly targeted a particular community despite being facially neutral (the Article 14 argument).⁸² And fourth, the court held that "sex" includes "sexual orientation" for the purposes of non-discrimination analysis (the Article 15 argument).⁸³

Many commentators praised the High Court's declaration that expressions of public morality via the law are still subject to an overarching "constitutional morality."⁸⁴ Others admired the expansion of sex to include sexual orientation,⁸⁵ while still others called Naz's subtle re-reading of privacy protection—namely, that privacy is linked to persons not places⁸⁶—its "most attractive feature."⁸⁷ To be sure, Naz is not perfect: not all of the arguments that could have been made were made or made well.⁸⁸ But overall, both the outcome and the reasoning have been widely celebrated.

Conversely, Koushal has inspired little besides anger and ridicule. The named petitioner, an astrologer, filed one of the many PIL suits challenging Naz on broadly religious or cultural grounds that were eventually consolidated for consideration by the Supreme Court.⁸⁹ The actual petitioners in Koushal included several individuals (including B.P. Singhal of Naz fame), two small political parties, a Keralite church alliance, JACK (also a Naz participant), the All India Muslim Personal Law Board, and a government entity called the Delhi Commission for the Protection of Child Rights.⁹⁰

The Koushal petitioners argued, among other things, that the High Court's findings of fact as to the harms caused by section 377 were insufficient—in other words, that there wasn't enough proof that the provision discouraged people from seeking HIV/AIDS support or that it caused privacy or dignity harms.⁹¹ They also challenged Naz's holding that section 377 discriminates against homosexuals as a class and that sex discrimination encompasses sexual-orientation discrimination.⁹² And several petitioners also made variants of a claim that the High Court had violated the separation of powers by failing to defer to the will of Parliament and, by extension, to the existence of a public morality that condemns same-sex acts.⁹³

⁹³ The Delhi Commission for the Protection of Child Rights argued that “the legislature has treated carnal intercourse against the order of nature as an offence” and that “[t]he presumption of

There's not much in the way of original reasoning in Koushal, but subsequent commentators have teased out the following arguments from its decidedly minimalist analysis: (1) section 377's prohibition of sodomy is presumptively constitutional because the Indian Penal Code was duly enacted (in 1860) and remains unamended on this point;⁹⁴ (2) this presumption of constitutionality stands because the High Court did not establish that sufficiently severe harms are inflicted upon sufficiently numerous people in the course of valid (that is, non-discriminatory) efforts to enforce the provision;⁹⁵ (3) people who engage in carnal intercourse "against the order of nature" are a separate class such that different laws can be applied against them without constitutional difficulty.⁹⁶

Needless to say, there are problems with this—not because there was no plausible argument to be made for reversing the Delhi High Court, but because Koushal contained virtually no argument at all. Most of the Supreme Court's review of Naz is perplexing or just plain wrong; all that is seemingly left coherent in Koushal is the bare argument of judicial deference to legislative acts.⁹⁷ Deference, of course, is a perfectly legitimate ground for declining to invalidate a law, even in the relatively deference-thin context of the Indian federal judiciary. But because the Koushal court made no attempt to grapple with the issues—an absence made clear by page after page of block quotations cribbed from other judges' efforts at grappling—its deference appears to be nothing more than a small and rather transparent fig leaf.⁹⁸

Having said all this, my intent is not to demonstrate why Koushal is a bad decision since it has been pretty thoroughly picked apart. Indeed, for our purposes, Naz and Koushal are interesting not because they are exemplars of legal reasoning or the lack thereof, but because they exemplify different trends in public interest litigation. To see why, we need to step back from the opinions and focus instead on the litigants and issues.

B. Competing Public Interests

Detached from section 377 and the criminalization of sodomy, Naz and Koushal are easily recognizable as examples of “classic” and “contemporary” PIL suits. Consider the moving parties: Naz was brought by a coalition of progressive-minded civil society actors and sympathetic government subsidiaries,⁹⁹ while Koushal was brought by a coalition of individual litigants and community organizations—religious rather than residential, perhaps, but community organizations nonetheless.¹⁰⁰ Or take the underlying goals of the suits as they are stated by the moving parties. The original writ petition submitted by the Naz Foundation in 2001 repeatedly references affirmative rights and social attitudes—“self-respect and dignity” on the one hand, and “doctrinaire and outmoded conception[s] of sexual relations” on the other.¹⁰¹ Conversely, the Koushal petitioners explained their motivations primarily using the language of religious or cultural protection and judicial deference.¹⁰² And finally, remember for whom the moving parties were act-

⁹⁹ On the similarity between the Naz petitioners and classic PIL petitioners, compare Naz, (2009) 160 DLT at 285, 288–91, with Baxi v. Uttar Pradesh, (1983) 2 SCC 308 (1981) (law professor filing a PIL case on behalf of the residents of a women’s home), and Khatoun v. Bihar, (1979) 3 SCR 169 (lawyer filing a writ petition on the basis of newspaper articles documenting the circumstances of accused persons awaiting trial). See also Baxi, supra note 16, at 116–17 (describing similar landmark PIL cases filed by sympathetic elite actors).

¹⁰⁰ On the similarity between the Koushal petitioners and contemporary PIL petitioners, compare Koushal, (2014) 1 SCC at 24–28, with Gautam Bhan, The Impoverishment of Poverty: Reflections on Urban Citizenship and Inequality in Contemporary Delhi, 26 ENV’T & URBANIZATION 547, 551, 553 (2014) (quoting Pitampura Sudhar Samiti v. Gov’t of NCT of Delhi, WP(C) 4215/1995 (Sept. 27, 2002) (Delhi High Ct.)) (discussing petitioners’ argument “that they [were] . . . a voluntary association of law abiding, peace-loving bonafide residents’ . . . who ha[d] . . . ‘purchased the plots and constructed their respective houses from their hard earned money’” and the court’s description of the public lands in question as having “‘been encroached by slum dwellers who have no right, title or interest in the said land and are merely trespassers’”) (citations omitted).

¹⁰² See, e.g., Koushal, (2014) 1 SCC at 30–31 (“[I]f the declaration made by the High Court is approved, then India’s social structure and the institution of marriage will be detrimentally affected and young persons will be tempted towards homosexual activities.”) (argument of the Trust God Missionaries); see also id. at 31 (“[C]ourts, by their very nature, should not undertake the task of legislating.”) (argument of the AIMPLB). Some of the Koushal petitioners also appealed to child protection and the non-absolute nature of all rights. See id. at 32 (“[A]ll fundamental rights operate in a square of reasonable restrictions.”) (argument of Suresh Kumar Koushal); Pallavi Polanki, Why Delhi Child Rights Commission Opposed De-criminalization of Gay Sex, FIRSTPOST (Dec. 14, 2013, 11:27 AM), <http://www.firstpost.com/india/why-delhi-child-rights-commission-opposed-de-criminalisation-of-gay-sex-1286883.html> [<https://perma.cc/W8JG-VLTR>] (“In the last 150 years, there have been only 200 cases where this section has been effectively applied. All ing: marginalized and scorned minorities in Naz, versus themselves and similarly situated citizens in Koushal.

Seen in this light, Naz is clearly the archetype of the classic PIL suit in which philanthropic third-parties fight to change Indian society by defending or expanding the rights of disadvantaged groups. And just as surely—though perhaps not as clearly—Koushal is emblematic of a more contemporary PIL suit in which parties who are motivated by a sense of personal harm fight to hold the state up to its obligations as the agent of a sovereign, rights-bearing democratic citizenry.

It's true that Koushal stands somewhat apart from the new model of PIL suits inasmuch as it focuses on religious, cultural, and moral claims rather than on economic or good-governance demands.¹⁰³ But this difference does not fundamentally change the fact that Koushal, like many of the contemporary PIL suits decried by court-watchers and legal scholars, emphasizes the state's duty to be a good agent of the petitioners rather than a good reformer of society.

It also doesn't matter that the outcome sought by the Koushal petitioners may be fundamentally distasteful in a way that, say, preferring parks over nursing homes is not.¹⁰⁴ The fact that Koushal stands apart from many other those cases applied to sodomy and in more than 90 per cent of the cases, the victims were minors. So the application of the Section 377 was to protect victims . . .”).

¹⁰³ Interestingly, and despite their focus on religious and cultural protection, there's no reason to think the Koushal petitioners drew on section 295(A) of the Indian Penal Code, which prohibits harms to religious sentiments under various circumstances. Indian Penal Code, No. 45 of 1860, PEN. CODE §§ 295–298, <http://indiacode.nic.in/fullact1.asp?tfnm=186045> [<https://perma.cc/37YU-KYMD>]. The Koushal opinion itself makes no reference to section 295, and this element of the statute does not seem to figure in public conversations (including those emphasizing the petitioners' point of view). Perhaps this is because section 295(A) punishes “deliberate and malicious” action that offends religious beliefs—it would translate to something like a criminal charge of intentional infliction of emotional distress (for religion) in the American context—and it seems ludicrous to think of Naz Foundation members being imprisoned or otherwise subject to criminal liability for their advocacy and social work. Naz Foundation, after all, would not even be in a position analogous to the doctors in Griswold who were subject to criminal liability for prescribing contraceptives. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 480–81 (1965). While it's always risky to indulge in ex post facto speculation regarding litigation strategies, the most plausible explanation for the fact that Koushal omitted any section 295(A) arguments might simply be that petitioners and judges alike decided the approach would be politically unpopular, or that the credibility of PIL suits depends on the petitioners' ability to demonstrate that they “have no personal, political or financial interest of any kind in the public interest litigation brought.” Susman, supra note 20, at 70 (emphasis added). Nevertheless, there remains a troubling potential for overlap between section 295(A) and section 377. Given the wide and frequently specious net cast by the Koushal petitioners, an argument combining the two IPC sections and applying them against LGBT individuals wouldn't have seemed wholly out of place.

contemporary PIL suits—to say nothing of classic ones—in its espousal of a socially conservative rather than a neo-liberal morality just goes to show that public interest litigation is incapable of returning consistently progressive or even consistently non-progressive results. Indeed, variations on this point are being made with growing frequency by the commentators discussed in Part I. What isn't being said is that the fact that public interest litigation gets deployed to inconsistent ends—notwithstanding the specific outcomes in Naz and Koushal—is a reflection of something fundamental and fundamentally good in the Indian Constitution.

III. DYNAMIC EQUILIBRIUM IN PUBLIC INTEREST LITIGATION

If *Naz*¹⁰⁵ and *Koushal*¹⁰⁶ represent the great divide in public interest litigation, why should legal liberals be anything but let down by the trajectory they see? After all, Indian law and politics are strikingly concerned with social uplift.¹⁰⁷ Why isn't it cause for disappointment when a once-celebrated path to progressive ends turns out to lead elsewhere as well? The answer is simply that Indian law and politics—we can even go so far as to say Indian constitutionalism and democracy—were never meant to exclusively pursue aspirational goals. That they are meant to pursue such goals is beyond question. Nevertheless, as I've argued elsewhere, this support for government-driven societal reform coexists with contrasting and constitutionally defined political values.¹⁰⁸ Indian jurisprudence, including public interest litigation, properly reflects the constant recalibration between these different visions of state-society relations.

language of Bangalore nicely captures the turn to middle-class interests and a vision of the state as agent rather than sovereign: “[I]n a democratic set up the people or community being sovereign, the exercise of discretion must be guided by the inherent philosophy that the exerciser of discretion is accountable for his action” and “[p]ublic park as a place reserved for beauty and recreation is associated with growth of the concept of equality and recognition of importance of common man.” Id. at 109, 144.

Indira Jaising, a prominent Supreme Court advocate, commented: “The Constitution of India is very much focused on social change. And so we as citizens, as lawyers, whenever we look at a program or whenever we criticize a program, we have this one test in front of us: how is it going to advance social justice?” Id.

¹⁰⁸ Das Acevedo, supra note 11; Deepa Das Acevedo, Religion, Law, and the Making of a Liberal Indian State 31–80 (June 2013) (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, The University of Chicago) (on file with author).

Briefly put, the two underlying impulses in this constitutionally enshrined dynamic equilibrium correspond to two understandings of democratic sovereignty. On the one hand, the Indian Constitution is “a social document” and a “majority of its provisions are either directly aimed at furthering the goals of the social revolution or attempt to foster this revolution by establishing the conditions necessary for its achievement.”¹⁰⁹ In the militant vision of democratic ordering, the state exercises far more than the discretionary authority we might ordinarily expect of an agent or representative—for example, it can regulate anything touching the secular aspects of religion.¹¹⁰ (In practice, it also regulates a great deal touching the religious aspects of religion, but that’s beyond the scope of this paper.¹¹¹)

Indeed, many of the Constitution’s provisions and the practices they give rise to reflect an explicitly articulated worry that Indian citizens are not yet capable of fully exercising their authority as democratic sovereigns. Take, for example, the concerns of some drafters—eventually reflected in constitutional prose—that unlimited individual freedoms would hamper the state’s ability to reform society.¹¹² Or consider Justice Bhagwati’s worry that the average Indian’s religious beliefs would, if unchecked and unchanged, encourage a whole host of violent and discriminatory practices.¹¹³ Basic structure doctrine, too, reflects a mistrust of untrammled popular democracy, inasmuch as it places the undefined “essential features” of the Constitution beyond parliamentary revision (although admittedly India’s founding document is far more open to amendment than its un-entrenched American counterpart).¹¹⁴

Bhagwati, Religion and Secularism Under the Indian Constitution, in RELIGION AND LAW IN INDEPENDENT INDIA 35, 45 (Robert D. It could encourage and in its own subtle ways, even coerce indulgence in social evils like child marriage or even crimes like human sacrifice or it could consign women to the perpetual fate of devadasis or relegate large sections of humanity to the sub-human status of untouchability and inferiority.”). It’s worth noting that Bhagwati was one of the Supreme Court justices who created public interest litigation.

In light of all this, any suggestion that Indian democracy is straightforwardly founded on the idea of citizen sovereignty has more holes than Swiss cheese. It is not merely that India, like all countries, operates under a de facto arrangement whereby “elites, not masses, govern.”¹¹⁵ It is that the Indian state is meant to have a share in sovereign authority so that it can do more than just realize specific goods set out in advance by the people being governed. And it is in exactly this spirit that classic PIL petitioners and courts set out to improve the lives of India’s most marginalized citizens.

On the other hand, it would also be incorrect to say that a more conventional understanding of democratic sovereignty as citizen-sovereignty finds no place in Indian constitutional law or practice. The Indian Constitution guards against incursions into the private lives of individuals by allowing for conventionally liberal protections like “freedom of conscience and free profession, practice and propagation of religion.”¹¹⁶ B.N. Rau famously campaigned against including a due process clause in the Constitution after his conversations with James Bradley Thayer and Felix Frankfurter led him to believe it would be an undemocratic check on the legislative process.¹¹⁷ Above all else, though, many Indians—not just the drafters of the Constitution—were “intellectually committed to the liberal democratic tradition” as well as the idea that individual adult suffrage as the basis of political life was the “sine qua non of independence.”¹¹⁸

It is probably harder to recognize this vision of undivided citizen sovereignty in contemporary public interest litigation than it is to see shared sovereignty in classic PIL cases—and it’s also risky to imply, even indirectly, that citizen sovereignty naturally fits with social conservatism or neo-liberal politics. I am only making the first of these arguments, namely, that contemporary public interest cases often align with liberal democratic ideas of statehood and personhood as these are broadly and conventionally understood. PIL petitioners who argue for the municipal maintenance of common spaces over the rights of slum dwellers rely on a view of the individual-in-society, with all its accompanying baggage about public/private divides, that is decidedly and classically liberal.¹¹⁹ PIL petitioners who argue for transparency and accountability in governance rely on a view of sovereign delegation and agency theory that is decidedly and classically democratic.¹²⁰ And, whatever their particular merits or appeal, PIL petitioners who argue for the preservation of religious and cultural mores—at least, for their preservation until the legislature shouts otherwise—are relying on liberal democratic conceptions of society and sovereignty that also have a place in India’s founding document.¹²¹

CONCLUSION

Saying that Naz and Koushal and public interest litigation all reflect a dynamic equilibrium between different visions of sovereignty does not by itself establish that having such a dynamic equilibrium is good. Nor, for that matter, does it give us much of an idea as to how we should proceed—with Koushal, with public interest litigation, or with understanding Indian constitutional law more generally. So far I have been concerned with making an interpretive argument about processes at various levels of law in India, but let me close with a few thoughts on what this argument does and does not mean for the way forward.

¹¹⁹ See, e.g., Samiti, WP(C) 4215/1995; discussion supra note 100.

¹²¹ Again, I do not mean to say that the Koushal court’s acceptance of the deference argument was sound. As Vikram Raghavan points out, the court’s invocation of deference was inappropriate because the government had decided it “would abstain from asking the Court to revive the statute” and “even opposed a stay of the high court’s ruling while the appeals were pending before the Supreme Court”—and, moreover, that the “Attorney General explained all this to the Court in no uncertain terms.” Raghavan, Taking Sexuality Seriously, supra note 72.

First, it most certainly does not mean that progressives should applaud Koushal or that we should stop fighting for broadly left-center causes. It also does not mean that anyone should denigrate or de-emphasize the very real, very aspirational elements of the Indian Constitution and of democracy in India. But it does mean that progressives shouldn't respond to the so-called "conservative turn" in public interest litigation by throwing up our hands or by scrambling for newer, better fixes. Public interest litigation can't be "fixed," if fixing it means ensuring that it only (or even mostly) produces progressive outcomes, any more than we can "fix" the Indian Constitution. It shouldn't be fixed in this way. The great good sense of Indian constitutional law has been its flexibility; its incorporation of all kinds of legal traditions in the nation's charter, its catholicism in selecting mechanisms and sources and analytic rubrics when interpreting that charter, and its willingness to rewrite the charter with the benefit of lessons learned. The dynamic equilibrium between different visions of sovereign authority that I have described elsewhere and the particular manifestation of that dynamic in public interest litigation that I have described here is just one more example of the flexibility that has served India more than tolerably well for nearly seventy years.
